She is a twenty-six-year-old woman who Awakens aboard an alien spaceship 250 years after a nuclear war has killed off most of the human race and rendered Earth uninhabitable. Lilith is chosen by her alien captors, the Oankali, to lead a group of 40 other humans to return to Earth. She is chosen because she is intelligent, tolerant, and rational. Initially, she is repulsed by the appearance of the Oankali but she eventually learns to live among them. Throughout the novel, Lilith's humanity is repeatedly tested, but she always clings to the hope that one day humans will repopulate the Earth and be free from the Oankali. The Oankali is an alien species that survives through gene trading, meaning that they must mix their DNA with another species' DNA in order to continue evolving. The Oankali reside on a living, self-sustaining spaceship. They have three genders: male, female, and ooloi. One Oankali from each gender comes together to form a mating group. The Oankali have hard, gray skin covered in hundreds of anemone-like sensory tentacles that are more perceptive than human sensory organs. The ooloi have special sensory organs that allow that to manipulate the genes of other species. Oankali society is non-hierarchical which results in them hardly ever having any conflicts. The Oankali are incapable of brutality or lying, but they are known to lie through omission. Jdahya is the first Oankali to reveal itself to Lilith. Jdahya is a male Oankali whose job is to help acclimate Lilith to the Oankali way of life. He speaks English and is very understanding and patient, and Lilith quickly becomes attached to him. Jdahya take Lilith into his family so that she will learn to live among the Oankali. Nikanj is Jdahya's ooloi child. Nikanj is supposed to bond with Lilith so that when it reaches maturity it can combine its Oankali mates' DNA with Lilith's DNA. Initially, Lilith resents being treated as Nikanj's pet, but eventually the two bond. Lilith must help Nikanj through the maturation process, which can be painful to ooloi. After Nikanj is mature, it grants Lilith special abilities such as increased strength, memory, and healing. Nikanj and Lilith become dependent on each other, but their bond is misunderstood by the other Awakened humans who view it as traitorous. Kahguyahht is Jdahya's ooloi mate and one of the three parents of Nikanj. Kahguyahht is viewed as removed and condescending by Lilith but nonetheless intelligent. Paul Titus is a human that has grown up among the Oankali but has chose to remain on their ship instead of return to Earth with the other humans. He is also the first human that Lilith interacts with since her Awakening. Nikanj arranges a meeting for the two during which the two are supposed to mate. Lilith is unwilling to have sex with Paul Titus, so he then beats and attempts to rape her. Tate Marah is the first human to be Awakened by Lilith in the nursery. Tate is extremely strong-willed, intelligent, and manipulative. Although Tate is skeptical of the stories that Lilith tells her about the Oankali, Tate chooses to follow Lilith. The two even become good friends. Tate's intelligence and understanding of human nature are very helpful to Lilith as conflicts begin to arise among the awakened humans and her authority is challenged. Joseph is one of the 40 humans awakened by Lilith in the nursery. Soon after his Awakening, Joseph and Lilith become romantically involved and fall in love. Like Lilith, Joseph is also very intelligent and rational. Nikanj also grants Joseph special healing abilities; however, these abilities cause him to be brutally murdered because he is no longer seen as human by the group of human rebels. Peter is the first human to openly question Lilith's authority and her stories of the Oankali. He gains a following among the 40 Awakened humans and turns them against Lilith and the Oankali. On the day that the Oankali reveal themselves to the group of humans, he acts out violently and is killed by them. Curt, whose real name is Conrad Loehr, was a New York City cop before the nuclear war. Curt has violent tendencies yet is very protective of the people that are close to him. After he is first Awakened, he and Lilith get along. Lilith matches him with a weaker-willed woman named Celene which seems to help Curt adjust to his new life aboard the ship. After Peter's death, however, Curt takes his place as the leader of the opposition against Lilith and the Oankali. At the end of the novel, Curt attacks Lilith and kills Joseph because he is scared by their special abilities. Curt and Peter represent the negative aspects of humanity that led to the nuclear war in the first place. Ahajas and Dichaan are Nikanj's female and male mates respectively. They are loyal to Nikanj and Lilith. At the end of the novel, Nikanj impregnates both Lilith and Ahajas with children that will be Oankali-human hybrids. Cover art by John Jude Palencar I first found Dawn, about fifteen years ago, in my local library. I hadn't heard of Octavia Butler. I'm not sure why I picked Dawn up. It was probably the post-apocalyptic blurb; I've always been drawn to stories about the end of humanity as we know it. I hadn't yet realised that what I liked about those stories was often the fact that they are really about beginnings, too. Dawn is absolutely about a beginning, and how painful that can be. Butler makes hundreds of brave choices throughout the book that still stagger me, and defy traditional writing advice. That's obvious from that first section alone, Womb, with its introduction to Lilith Lyapo, one of the few survivors of a terrible war on Earth, saved and also kidnapped and drugged by an alien race called the Oankali. Womb starts with the awakening of Lilith in a plain white chamber. Tests have been performed upon her, including some sort of surgery that has left a scar across her abdomen, but no explanation has ever been given to her. We're meeting Lilith as a captive, so we're not getting to know what she was like before that experience, and that's a big risk that only pays off because Butler is such a strong creator of character. While describing Lilith in this environment, she manages to give us a sense of a person in continuation. Lilith has experienced many things, and that influences her decisions. She's already a survivor, on many levels. Therefore she explores the room in which she's being kept, and she attempts to make sense of it. She carries out tests herself, upon her surroundings. The fear Lilith feels is not the focus of the writing, although it's absolutely present. The emphasis is on her desire to understand, and once that's established, it allows us to see the Oankali in a different light. They are not immediately monsters because we are looking for clues as to why they've treated Lilith in this way. We want answers more than we want to pursue an emotional response. The Oankali are then introduced in a long sequence of intense dialogue, where Lilith battles her own physical reactions while talking to an alien who is happy to provide only certain amounts of information. It's a conversation that throws out some amazing ideas to do with genetics, sexuality, survival and morality. The alien tries to keep still throughout so that Lilith can adjust to its presence, which revolts her, and this juxtaposition of visceral reaction to intellectual engagement in a vacuum of action is one of the most powerful reading experiences I've ever had, and certainly something I've tried to capture in my own writing sometimes. It doesn't simplify anything for the reader, and it doesn't lose any aspect of being human. Lilith's body reacts to the creature in one way, and her mind in another way, and yet she is still absolutely a strong, cohesive character. All of this is achieved using very accessible language. Butler proves that far-reaching concepts and hugely layered experiences can be conveyed, together, to produce an intense, engrossing read that defies the usual approach to writing about first contact scenarios. The sense of otherness that Lilith struggles to accept is not based in an inability to communicate clearly with the alien, or to make sense of its wants and desires. It flows from that deep-down repulsion she feels to its tentacle-like sensory organs, and it simply refuses to accept her response to it. It demands that she looks at it, and engages with it, in an attempt to forge a relationship that gets past her initial reactions. I found myself to be unsure of many things when I reached the end of the first section of Dawn. There wasn't a comfortable place to stand in relation to the Oankali. They held people against their will and performed surgeries upon them, but they could argue this was for good reason; the surgery was often life-saving, such as removing a cancerous growth in Lilith's case. They forced humans into stressful situations and unwanted contact, but they did this in the name of species survival. There are no straightforward answers for Lilith, or us. She will be forced to make very difficult decisions where no choice could be said to be the correct one. After I read Dawn, I thought about it a lot. I asked my library to track down the other two books in the Xenogenesis trilogy for me (this was before I could order them myself online) and for some reason they never did manage to find them, so the consequences of Lilith's decisions for humanity and for the Oankali was not something I discovered until much later. This gave the book an added power, I think. It was a frozen moment. I borrowed the book many times, trying to work out how Butler made it work; it was so different from anything else I had read. It asked such amazing questions without ever losing my interest. When I came to write The Beauty, Butler's work was very much in my mind because I wanted to raise the kind of questions she had. The first time my narrator, Nathan, meets the strange creatures that have grown on the graves of the dead women of his community, the Womb section was my guide. I tried to use the same techniques Butler used to heighten the strangeness, yet reveal the possibility of acceptance without sacrificing otherness. There's a wonderful moment early on in Womb when the Oankali that Lilith first meets brings her a gift—a banana. It's the perfect object in that setting, because Butler can describe Lilith's delight in it lovingly, bringing colour and depth to the scene. It's not an uncomplicated gift. It suggests that the aliens care for Lilith's needs and understand her humanity, but that comes with an uncomfortable undercurrent. They know how to please her. They have been observing her. But still, who can resist such ripe fruit? When, in The Beauty, Nathan is first kidnapped and held, his captors bring him a similar gift: apples, and a honeycomb. They are given in recognition of human needs and wants, recognising the sweetness of Earth's fruit. This also reminds us that he knows nothing about the creatures that are holding him, and what their own wants and needs might entail. That symbolic gift in The Beauty is a result of my long admiration of Octavia Butler's Dawn. Everything has more than one meaning, and there are so many ways to make a beginning work.
